Listen Up: Ears In The Real World

Stephanie Wright

Emily Cohen

Gregg Swedberg

Mike Molinar

Keeping up with the deluge of new music feels a bit like filling a shot glass from a firehose. For thoughts on managing the music flow, Country Aircheck spoke with four pros whose jobs involve lots of listening.

From publisher pitches to recording projects, UMG/Nashville SVP/A&R Stephanie Wright is listening as much as four hours a day. "Several years ago, I would probably listen to 70 songs a day," she says, though pitch meetings have been less frequent since the pandemic. Listening purposefully is important to Wright's approach. "We have a really great listening room where I can shut the door and minimize interruptions," she says. "A lot of people put music on in their office when they're working, but people walk in and out. Well, when we're listening, that is the job."

For Amazon Music Principal Music Curator Emily Cohen, music is "all day every day." The tools of her trade include the Amazon Music For Artists pitch tool and a plain old web browser. "My team makes fun of me sometimes because I'll have a lot of browser tabs open at once to keep it all organized," she says. "I just go down the list of emails and submissions, listening throughout the week. Supplementally I'm on social media, Shazam charts, TikTok and our own charts to see if I've missed anything that's bubbling up."

iHeartMedia/Minneapolis OM & KEEY PD Gregg Swedberg starts with music that's sent to him. "I scour to see what's streaming," he says. "That's just part of the job now. And I'll listen to new albums a couple times

Walking 9 To 5 With Hanrahan

In September, former iHeartMedia/Alabama Area SVP/Programming Tom Hanrahan unexpectedly found himself with an abundance of free time – his first stretch without a job since he was 13. Facing the uncertainty of "what's next?" after 37 years in radio, he decided to go on a (long) walk.

The pilgrimage history of Camino de Santiago, or Way of St. James, stretches all the way back to medieval times. "Ironically, I knew nothing about it," Hanrahan laughs. "My wife was the one who actually brought it to my attention."

THANK YOU, COUNTRY RADIO!

Despite having never traveled to Europe – or even owning a passport – Hanrahan made a spontaneous decision to fly to France and begin a 500-mile journey to Santiago, Spain. “In almost 40 years, I hadn’t really taken a break until the break was given to me,” he says. “I needed the time and space to process what had happened and release negative feelings and emotions.”

He credits ignorance for the confidence to get on the plane. “I would’ve been paralyzed by too much research,” he acknowledges. “But I knew whenever God opens up the door to whatever I end up doing next, I wanted to be able to think clearly enough to hear. I knew if I spent five weeks out in the middle of Spain walking in silence, I’d have a fighting chance to finally clear my mind.”

Two weeks and one day after hearing about its existence, Hanrahan was taking his first steps on the Camino. Day one began with freezing rain and a sleet storm in the Pyrenees mountains. “I literally got lost on day-one taking the route over the mountain instead of around the mountain,” he confesses. “Thankfully, a man saw that I was lost and clueless and invited me to walk with him.” He spent the next couple of weeks relying on guidance and encouragement from the Brazilian stranger, Flavio, before an injury reversed their roles. “Flavio ended up walking a couple of weeks on a broken hip,” Hanrahan recounts. “And I was in a position, from a physical standpoint, to help him when he needed it most.” The friendship continued off the Camino. “We still keep up with each other on WhatsApp,” Hanrahan explains. “I met a wonderful friend that I now have for life.” After saying “adios” to Flavio,

Hanrahan had about two weeks left on the Camino to do mostly by himself. “I met people from Korea, Australia, the UK, Germany ... you name it. When you get out of your bubble of Birmingham, AL, this world is a big place.”

Hanrahan hit his first wall on day seven or eight. “It was the first time I’d FaceTime’d with my wife,” he recalls. “Seeing her back home with all the comforts of life while I was 6,000 miles away – I was physically and mentally just broken. I asked myself, ‘How am I going to do this?’” His biggest reason for not quitting was not wanting to let his family down: “I didn’t want to model failure in front of my kids. I knew my family would support me, but I wanted to demonstrate, ‘Hey, when you get hit with something you’re not expecting, you’ve got a couple of different paths you can go down in how you handle it. Most importantly, pick yourself up and keep going.’”

It’s one thing to hike 15-to-19 miles-per-day, but it’s another to do it with a 20-pound pack on your back, as Hanrahan quickly realized. “I met a priest from Long Island who told me we all pack our greatest fears, and I thought, ‘Man, what a great statement.’” His fears stemmed from his perceived lack of preparation. “I was afraid I didn’t have the right rain jacket or shoes, or that I was going to need a big chest of medical supplies. What if I fall down? What if I break my leg?” The more confidence he gained, the less his pack weighed. “You only need so many pairs of clothes, socks and underwear, a water bottle and some snacks. And if you’re going to survive and get through this, you’re going to have to really cut it down.”

Chairing Is Caring: Warner Music Nashville Co-Chairs/Co-Presidents Ben Kline and Cris Lacy kick off 2023 alongside their team at a company-wide off-site meeting (1/11).

Reflecting on the experience, Hanrahan says he learned a lot about himself that he liked ... and a lot he didn't. Among his biggest takeaways were humility and work-life balance. "I had a bad habit of not living my life –going through the motions but not really living," he says. Hanrahan remains thankful for being "pulled off the hamster wheel" and encourages others to "see the good, even amongst the thorns." "In my old life, on the hard days, I couldn't see the good. When it's just you and God and earth and sky, it's so much clearer. See the good God has for you every day. Trust me, it's there."

On whether or not he'd hike the Camino again, Hanrahan says, "Absolutely. It probably won't be this year and maybe not even next year, but I definitely am going to do it again, because I want to go back and experience it after learning from the mistakes that I made." through. You can't do that with everyone, but you can certainly do it with the top 50. Plus, you'll get a hint from streaming which tracks you definitely want to hear."

Ear Thirty: The biggest issue is time. "Mornings are for radio listening, but when that's done, I'll put on music," Swedberg says. "I'm listening all the time. If I'm doing reports at work or playing a video game at home, I've got music on in the background."

Also listening to the radio is Big Machine Music GM Mike Molinar. "I'm listening to the Nashville stations, as well as the Highway and other SiriusXM stations," he says. "My commute is 15-20 minutes and any time I'm in the car, I'm listening. And I bounce around a lot. If I don't hear something new or I like, I change pretty fast."

That applies to office listening, as well. "Sometimes it's just verse-chorus and I move on," Molinar says. "Especially during the work day. In trying to develop radio ears, I fully accept some things have to be first-listen. And maybe it's not fair to say radio ears versus first-listen ears. Everybody is moving fast – fans, too. Is this going to jump out on the first listen? But I've pitched songs saying, 'This isn't a one-listen, this is a slow burn, but it's going to get you there.'"

Finding the balance between quick decision making and letting music breathe is not a science. "There are no hard rules," Cohen says. "If it's something I've been wanting to hear, I'll listen to the whole thing. But when you're going through a lot of brand-new music or artists, it's, 'Are you grabbing me in the first 30 seconds?'"

"New songs, it's probably verse-chorus," Wright agrees. "If you're waiting for that third verse payoff, you might not get there. Today's listeners don't wait for that."

Finding those slow-burn songs takes repetition. "You have to be beaten down," Swedberg says. "Sometimes, I'm flat out wrong. Unless record people are reading this – then I'm never wrong."

You You Usually: Successful listening also turns the focus outward. "There are things I love that may not be everyone's favorite," Wright says. "The difference is, what works best for the artist? What is the song's potential?"

"I have to de-center myself from the conversation," Cohen says. "If data points to our customers liking something, I need to honor that and program it. Granted, it's not all about data. There's instinct, which I definitely use on a daily basis. But for the most part, it's really up to our customers."

Molinar adds, "Paraphrasing a former boss, 'You just have to pitch it. You don't have to sleep with it.' Sometimes the emotional attachment is missing, and that's okay if a song works for somebody."

Long days and dead ears are a job hazard. "There are times listening is pointless," Swedberg says. "If I'm in a bad mood, I can convince myself everything is garbage. If I'm in a good mood, it's remarkable how many great songs there are."

Noting that in oneself is the key. "When everything starts to sound the same I know I've had enough," Wright says. "And sometimes I'll hear three great things, come back the next day and realize they were average at best. Sometimes the whole day was a wash. Remember, there aren't a lot of truly amazing songs. It takes a lot of listening to get to 'The House That Built Me' or 'Buy Dirt.' There's really good, and then there's great."

Resetting can take a number of approaches. "I'll take a walk if the weather permits," Cohen says. "Or listen to a podcast – do something else entirely." Wright says, "Silence is really important for me. I also have kids of all ages and sharing music with them fills my cup again." Swedberg offers, "I'll listen to other kinds of music or watch TV. I absorb a lot of media and should probably get out more." Molinar adds, "It's important to remember the music that made you love music. I go back to old soul and R&B. When in doubt, turn on some Sam Cooke."
